UNPACKING PROFILING

Numerous experts and community members have outlined how profiling impacts their communities and most especially their lives.

This section of the toolkit seeks to unpack profiling, explore the issues involved and deepen understanding. This is done through two tracks. First, an analytical unpacking asks the question “Why does profiling happen?” This section summarizes cause, effect, and implications of profiling, as expressed by various stakeholders. The second part undertakes a narrative unpacking where the lived experiences of the profiled, the people in power and other community members are presented. This paints a multi-perspective picture of the phenomenon of profiling itself.

IN THIS SECTION

17 WHY DOES PROFILING HAPPEN?
17 WE ARE NOT TALKING ENOUGH
18 WE ARE NOT DOING ENOUGH
20 WE DO NOT UNDERSTAND ENOUGH
22 WHAT ARE THE LIVED EXPERIENCES & VIEWS OF PEOPLE?
One of the key arguments among activists is that the authorities dilute the conversation. Though state organizations have commissioned various reports on profiling over the years, the response and follow ups to the reports have been either mixed or muted. This diminishes the magnitude of the problems with profiling and subsequently waters down any ameliorative measures. Activists specifically emphasize that acknowledging the nature and extent of the issue is a key step to addressing it. State actors, in their defense, point to various conversations that have indeed taken place. Police-community tensions also continue to exist in various forms, sometimes leading to a breakdown of trust and communication.

"THEY HAVE TO ACCEPT TO USE THE R-WORD, THE SYSTEMATIC RACISM CONCEPT. TO ADDRESS RACISM, PEOPLE NEED TO FIRST BE ABLE TO TALK ABOUT IT." [1]
- Fo Niemi
Executive Director of Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations

"RECOGNIZING THAT THERE IS A PROBLEM IS THE FIRST STEP. WE WON'T BE ABLE TO DEAL WITH THESE ISSUES AS LONG AS WE AVOID ACKNOWLEDGING THE PROBLEM." [2]
- Will Prosper
Ex-RCMP officer, community activist, Hoodstock organiser and documentary filmmaker

"I HAVE A RESPONSIBILITY TO BE KIND TO PEOPLE AND THAT'S JUST THE WAY I WAS BROUGHT UP. I WAS LUCKY ENOUGH TO GROW UP AROUND WASHINGTON DC - WHICH IS ONE OF THE MORE DIVERSE AREAS IN THE US. IF I GREW UP IN THE MIDDLE OF NOWHERE IN OKLAHOMA THEN I MIGHT BE A COMPLETELY DIFFERENT PERSON. YOU'RE A PRODUCT OF YOUR ENVIRONMENT. I WAS LUCKY THAT I GREW UP AROUND OF A LOT OF PEOPLE WHO WEREN'T LIKE ME SO IT WASN'T UNUSUAL TO ME." [3]
- JR Hayes
Pig Destroyer Band Member

One reason for the continued problem of profiling is that not enough corrective action is being taken to improve the perceptions and attitudes of state actions, and there is inadequate supportive action within communities. There is the perception that when instances of profiling are identified there are not enough disciplinary measures against the offending officers and that the system does not respond adequately. For example, there is a lack of representation for profiled communities within the police departments.

From a preventive stance, it is necessary to sensitize police and other state forces to the lived experiences of the profiled in order to develop both understanding and empathy. On the other hand, currently there are limited supportive actions within communities; these are only sporadically or unevenly available, if at all.

For example, arts-based approaches serve to support the community in the context of dehumanizing experiences such as profiling. There is evidence to show that arts-based and humor-based interventions have benefits for the community. To view examples see Project SOMEONE initiatives Learning to Hate: an Anti-Hate Comic Project as well as Landscape of Hope, both of which explore the boundaries of inclusivity of marginalized communities by creating exclusive artistic spaces for them to project their unique narratives.
However such support systems are available only in select urban pockets, leaving a vast majority of the communities without access to such opportunities. Finally, there is the issue of public perception of communities. The media paints and emphasizes stereotyped images of communities which the public often consumes unquestioningly. This leads to the narrative of some communities being prone to criminal intentions, which in turn leads to increased profiling. There is scope for more action in both correcting such representations in the media, and in educating people to view such representations with a critical eye.

"We have rules... but are they enforced? Are they even practically enforceable in today's policing context and culture? Is the burden on the victim reasonable given the nature of the actions taken against them? The existence of formal rules is not the end of the story. Far from it. It is also necessary to look at the actual practical application - on the ground - of these rules to assess whether there is a systemic problem. Without admitting it, ... your position has just changed from "the system tolerates racism" to "the legal system may have shortcomings in investigating and punishing racist acts". Two radically different positions. A social system that continually tolerates a legal system that has shortcomings in investigating and punishing racist acts is a system that tolerates racism."

-An anonymised social media user

Yet another aspect that underlies the phenomenon of profiling is the claim that not enough is understood about the issue, what causes it and how it may be addressed. The first claim is that there are not enough data about how extensive the issue of profiling is, and whether the phenomenon is concentrated in particular communities. Available public reports analyze data of certain regions in certain time frames, but such data are not available in consolidated forms. [1]

Secondly, there is the issue of unconscious bias. This refers to the idea that some human actions are driven by prejudices that one is not necessarily aware of. In the case of profiling, it would imply that police officers may indeed be profiling community members but there is no conscious intent on their part to discriminate. Their actions are driven by conditioning and other elements that creates an unconscious bias against the community. Unconscious bias is extensively researched, and there is evidence to demonstrate that it does indeed exist among police officers, but not enough is known about what is a realistic solution to the issue. [2]

The third aspect is a lack of cultural and religious understanding. Not being open towards practices and beliefs that are different from one’s own leads to a sense of othering, which in turn leads to discriminatory behaviour. There is not enough education and understanding among communities regarding such differences. A variation of this is an understanding of the power of symbols and how they affect perceptions. Symbols such as the hijab, for example, stand out in this context. Comments on online forums show that while some members of the public are attuned to how symbols, whether they are religious or cultural (such as flags, fleur de lis, red poppy) are visible enablers of discrimination. [1]

The fourth area affected by a lack of understanding is that those in positions of power and privilege do not actually understand the dehumanizing nature of profiling. This makes it difficult for them to see the perspective of the profiled and also the need for action on it. Finally, there exists the reality that profiling can be bi-directional. Communities also hold stereotyped views of those in power, and do not always appreciate that individual and institutional views may be different among the police. This further adds to the complexity of conversations or actions. [1]

‘IT’S ABOUT EXISTENCE FOR CHILDREN OR YOUNG PEOPLE; TO WALK AROUND WITH THE AWARENESS THAT SOMETHING COULD HAPPEN. IT’S ABOUT BEING CAREFUL; BEING CAREFUL OF WHAT YOU SAY; BEING CAREFUL NOT TO TALK TOO LOUD; BEING CAREFUL NOT TO ATTRACT ATTENTION. LIVING THIS WAY CAN BE VERY ROUGH ON YOUNG PEOPLE AND CHILDREN. IT IS A HUGE BURDEN, INCLUDING PSYCHOLOGICALLY, AND YOU DON’T FEEL FREE TO EXIST.’ [2]

- Elsa F. Mondésir
Youth educator and member of the Youth Advisory Group of the Canadian Commission for UNESCO

‘IT’S NOT THE INTENT OF THE POLICE OFFICERS THAT WE NEED TO FOCUS ON, IT’S THE EXPERIENCE OF THE PERSON THAT’S BEEN STREET CHECKED THAT WE NEED TO FOCUS ON. AND IF THAT EXPERIENCE IS ONE OF DISCRIMINATION, THEN WE HAVE A PROBLEM WITH PUBLIC TRUST AND PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE POLICE.’ [1]

- Dylan Mazur
Community lawyer with BCCLA

DISCUSSIONS ON SOCIAL MEDIA

IN REGARDS TO RACIAL PROFILING, THERE ARE THOSE WHO BELIEVE THAT:

- POLICE CHECKS ARE EXAGGERATED
- DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN WHITES AND VISIBLE MINORITIES
- ITS JUST A VICTIMIZATION SCHEME
- THE POLICE ARE ONLY DOING THEIR JOB
- WE ALL HAVE UNCONSCIOUS BIASES
- POLICE DON’T TRUST COMMUNITIES
- COMMUNITIES DON’T TRUST THE POLICE

Click on any of the names to hear more about their experiences and views on racial and social profiling.